Digital Humanities in History and Archaeology

In the recent years "Digital Humanities" has become a common term in historical and archaeological research and many projects are currently dealing with this topic. The presentation aims at exploring how archaeology and history create digital data and how they are used. What types of analyses can be carried out and how can the results be presented and visualised? How does the research benefit from digital methods compared to traditional ones. And of course we will discuss the question if digital humanities are just a useful tool or proper science.
